Section A: A Chance Encounter

In this passage, the narrator, Gabriel, is playing in his back garden when he meets Finnigan.

SAMPLE

I remember my first sight of him – the sound and scavenger look of him – surrounded by summer. Neither of us was older than nine or ten. I was running a car along the garden fence when Finnigan appeared. At first I pretended not to see him, but the car beneath my fingers stopped moving. I slid a glance at him. At school we had seen a wildlife film, and this boy was a scruffy lion. He didn't move or say a thing but I knew, just from his watching, that he could sever my arm. We were the same height and same age and built along similar leggy lines, but he was a lion while I was a small moth. He swiped a fly from his face. "You're that boy," he said.

"...What boy?"

"You know. That boy. Everybody knows."

I pressed my thumb on the bonnet of the car. I looked my questioner up and down. His clothes were shabby and ill-fitting. The fly had returned to his face. "You're the kook* boy," he explained. "Your mother and father are kooks too."

I considered the situation, his evident supremacy. I laughed. "Kooks," I said, and found it a sweet word. I deliberately hopped from one foot to the other, wagging my head. "Kooks," I chirruped again, to prove I'd taken no offence.

"Your mother's a witch," he said. "Everybody knows."

There seemed no response to this so I smiled, pretended my knee itched and attended to scratching it. The gypsy boy watched silently, the fly sniffing the corner of his mouth. I had never seen him before and was honoured that a stranger should have noticed my family. I didn't want him to go away. I asked, "How come you don't go to school?"

"Why would I?" he replied.

His eyes returned to the car parked on the fence railing. I poked it so it rattled forward. My father's sister Sarah had sent the car in the mail. The plaything had so far managed to escape my mother's usual confiscation. The visitor's eyes lingered on the car until I felt a twitch of nerves – then, mercifully, his gaze moved on to the house. I smelt the paint on the fence, the heat in the leaves, the parched conclusion of the afternoon. The boy, so close, smelt of nothing. He slipped a fist between the fence and asked, "What do I have in my hand?"

I looked at the fist curled under my nose. His fingers were brown as a conker, the skin on the knuckles broken. In my mind's eye I pictured what such fingers could hide. A tooth, a stone, a beetle. "Money?"
